

NEWS AND TOOLS FOR HAPPINESS, LOVE, AND WISDOM

volume 11.1 Fanuary - February 2017

LEARNING THE LANGUAGE OF CONSCIOUSNESS

How to see through all those stories we unknowingly spin that keep us in resistance—and pain.

© 2016 MARY O'MALLEY

This article first appeared in the July/August 2016 issue of Unity Magazine (published by Unity).

We spend our lives living in an imaginary self, listening to the stories in our head whose foundation was created when we were young. This storyteller, who talks all day long, thinks about life rather than living it and struggles with almost everything. When a challenge shows up in our lives, we try to control it, fix it, get rid of it, or judge it—wanting it to be different than it is. This happens

Greetings

The Wise Brain Bulletin offers skillful means from brain science and contemplative practice – to nurture your brain for the benefit of yourself and everyone you touch.

The Bulletin is offered freely, and you are welcome to share it with others. Past issues are posted at http://www.wisebrain.org/tools/wise-brain-bulletin.

Rick Hanson, PhD, edits the Bulletin. Michelle Keane is its managing editor, and it's designed and laid out by the design team at Content Strategy Online.

To subscribe, go to http://www.wisebrain.org/tools/wise-brain-bulletin.

whether the challenge is small (like getting upset because the traffic light is taking too long to turn green) or much bigger (like losing a job, getting cancer, or dealing with the death of a loved one). Our challenges are here to teach us, helping to not only see but also see through this storyteller we all took on when we were young.

Slowly and surely, human beings are waking up in greater numbers than ever before, and we are beginning to realize that what heals this struggling self is consciousness. Becoming a conscious (or awakened) being is learning how to see and be with "what is." That's why Rumi's "The Guest House" is such a popular poem. To paraphrase, Rumi tells us that every morning (I say "every moment"), a new arrival shows up (such as fear, anger, sadness, loneliness, despair, happiness, love, or joy). Rumi invites us to meet each of these arrivals at the door laughing (which I can't quite do all of the time) because each has been sent as a guide from beyond to clear us out for some new delight.

Rumi is telling us that living consciously is not being a victim to what is happening but actually bringing curiosity to what is showing up—all of it. Since our attention is usually caught in the stories in our head, we have to be reminded again and again that we are not these struggling selves we mistakenly believe we are. Who we really are can see and be with whatever we are experiencing. It is the difference between saying "I am afraid" and "Fear is here."

The House of Your Mind

Imagine that you are living in a huge house with a family. You have aunts, uncles, grandparents, cousins, children, and siblings, and you are constantly trying to keep all of these people happy. When Uncle Joe gets angry, he upsets the family. When Cousin Clara is crying all the time, the children become anxious. Then there is Daughter Deanna, who is always smiling and laughing, and she drives everyone crazy because she is such a Goody Two-shoes.

Well, that is what it's like to live inside your struggling self. You are living in the house of your mind with all these parts that you think belong to you. What you don't realize is that not only are these parts not your family, but it isn't even your house! In other words, you are not your struggling mind. These voices are merely parts of you that you absorbed from those around you when you were young, and they got frozen inside.

Throughout the past 14 months, I have been walking alongside my son on his journey with cancer as well as dealing with a host of other challenges. I woke up in the middle of the night not long ago and found Great Uncle Dread was here. My mind initially reacted and said, I am going to get up and go into the kitchen and eat something because numbing myself with food was how I took care of this deep, painful part of me when I was young. Then I said to myself, What about taking a few minutes and just being with this dread? As I brought my attention into my body, I once again discovered this place right below my stomach that I had been afraid of for so many years. That night, as my attention came into the physicality of my dread, recognizing and acknowledging it, the tightly held energy let go and transformed into joy.

Each of your wounded parts that have gotten frozen inside of you (like dread, loneliness, not being enough, or deep fear) have their own view of the world. Your sad part has a different view than your angry part. Your confused part has a different view than your judgmental part. Your scared part has a different view (and a different experience) than your despairing part. The question is this: How can you learn to be with each of these parts so they can finally let go and heal? That doesn't happen in fixing them, changing them, or rising above them. Instead, when your attention and your experience come together, those hurt parts will naturally let go.

RALI: A Four-Step Process

I use a very simple technique to bring my attention and my immediate experience together so I can see and be with what is. (I use the acronym RALI—pronounced "rally"—to make it easier to remember them.) Although the process is simple, doing this work is like learning a foreign language. You need to put the time and effort into learning the language of consciousness, just as you would in learning French, Spanish, or Italian.

You'll use the first two steps the most because they get the bound-up energy moving. It is almost certain that your mind will try to do the next two steps to make something happen, but that usually only leads to frustration. When the door of your heart opens and you truly want to be with what is asking for your attention, those last two steps will unfold naturally.

R is Recognition. Being caught in your separate, struggling mind always tightens you. Rather than being at the mercy of what is tightening, you can become curious about it, recognizing that you are caught. I call this becoming a tightness detective. The easiest place to see how much you struggle and tighten around life is in your body. Do you often feel a fist in your solar plexus? Is there a hole in your belly? Is there an elephant sitting on your chest? Is your neck or back aching? Rather than seeing these sensations as problems, think of them as an alert system, helping you to recognize when you are caught in the world of struggle.

Simply recognizing that you are tight might not seem to make much of a difference, but as a moment of consciousness, it's actually quite powerful. You are relating to what you are experiencing rather than from it. Even if you are with the tightness for only a second, those moments accumulate and that is how—slowly and surely—you can look and unhook from your struggling self.

A is Acknowledgement. Once you recognize these tight places, you can learn to say to that lump in your throat or that fist in your solar plexus, I see you. The tightening in your body is fueled by parts of yourself that you disowned long ago. They are trying to share their world with you, just as children express what they are feeling through their bodies. And all of the parts are just like you; they long to be acknowledged. The more you do this without judging what you are experiencing, the more these parts let go.

L is Listening. After discovering the healing power of recognizing and acknowledging, you can give your tight or frozen parts what they needed and did not get when you were young—someone to just listen to them. Be very patient with this step, especially with the parts that you have hated, been afraid of, or have judged. Say to your anger, sadness, or loneliness: When you are ready, tell me about your world. For a while nothing may happen, but when you are caught, and you recognize and acknowledge what you are experiencing, you will find that whatever part is there will tell you how it experiences the world. The more your parts are heard, the more they can relax.

I is Invitation. The more you recognize, acknowledge, and hear from these parts of you, the more important it becomes to offer them a different view. They are used to experiencing life in the way they did when they were frozen inside of you when you were young. It can be a huge revelation when a part begins to see life differently. For example, you might say to the part of you that feels it is bad and wrong, "you are okay exactly as you are" or "you have always done the best you knew how with the conditioning you were given." It's important to offer this invitation to see things differently only after you have listened to these internal parts—otherwise, you are just overriding that part's experience of life.

It's also helpful to invite your attention back into this living moment after you have been exploring the different parts of your conditioned self. Notice the sounds around you, or the rising and falling of your breath, or see something in front of you as if you have never seen it before. The more you explore what puts a veil between you and this living moment, the easier it is to see the huge difference between being in your stories about life and being with the real thing.

The next time you're challenged by internal dialogue laced with worry, judgment, anger, or any other less-than-uplifting emotion, take a moment to realize that what you're hearing in your head is not coming from your true self, but rather from a hurt child who is reaching out for healing. Then rally behind the RALI technique, and watch your conditioned storyteller relax and let go, and your authentic self gradually emerge. That is true alchemy.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Mary O'Malley is an author, counselor and awakening mentor in Kirkland, Washington. In the early 1970's, a powerful awakening led Mary to begin changing her relationship with her challenges, freeing her from a lifelong struggle with self-judgment and despair. Mary's latest book, What's in the Way Is the Way, provides a revolutionary approach for healing your fears, anxieties, shame, and confusion, so you can live from a place of ease and well-being. www.maryomalley.com

PEOPLE PASSING

© 2016 JEANIE GREENSFELDER

Mindfulness reminds me to notice people I pass. When I have time, I talk, listen and deeply see another person. Psychoanalyst D.W. Winnicott said that when we see that we are being seen, we come to life.

The poem Pippa Passes by Robert Browning impacted me in high school. It's about a little girl strolling through her village unaware of the effect she is having on people she passes. Though Browning's poem is complex, the concept that our presence affects others stayed with me.

We still live in villages. Our walk to the well for water might be a drive to Starbucks, yet we like saying and hearing Good Morning. Daily small talk speaks to a primitive need for connection that we need to nurture in our culture.

We each have a library of "passing" memories. I remember a prison bus stopped at a corner and having eye contact with a man. I imagined we each pictured walking in the other's shoes. When someone doesn't return my smile, I recall learning that it's likely he/she didn't get enough smile-backs when an infant.

A 90-year-old woman serving pitta samples at Costco affected me. We talked. She liked being useful, loved her job. I think of the sales clerk, so happy when her daughter found a job; the waiter telling me about taking his toddler to the fair.

Wishing you many mindful, Pippa moments, here's my poem.

People Passing

By the grocery, a homeless man smokes.

Seeing me, he hides his cigarette, stands up, nods his head, and says,

Ma'am, may you have a beautiful day.

His greeting follows me into the store where I gather green beans and bread.

On leaving, I plan to thank the man, and talk to him, but he's gone.

The neighborhood yardman unloads his truck and emotions—he had another fight with his son, he just can't stop.

Later, near the beach—a gull eyes my smoked-salmon taco, and a boy whizzes by in his wheelchair.
I say Great day! to a woman passing—she frowns and shrugs her shoulders.

On my evening walk, a man parks his clunky red Thunderbird, gets out, sets his puppy on the roof, and reaches inside for packages. I say,

Cute dog, cute car, and pass by. Behind me, I hear

Ma'am! Ma'am! Cute car? Cute dog? What about me?

I look back and smile at the disheveled man.

In bed I remember Browning's poem,
"Pippa Passes," about a little girl walking, unaware of the effect she has on townspeople.

Thinking of the Pippas I passed today,
I wonder if one of them
lies in bed thinking of me.

(from Biting the Apple, Penciled In, 2012)

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Jeanie Greensfelder is a poet and a retired psychologist. A volunteer at Hospice of San Luis Obispo, CA, she does bereavement counseling. Her two books are Biting the Apple and Marriage and Other Leaps of Faith. Her poem, "First Love," was featured on Garrison Keillor's Writers' Almanac. Other poems are at American Life in Poetry, in anthologies, and in journals. She seeks to understand herself and others on this shared journey, filled, as Joseph Campbell wrote, with sorrowful joys and joyful sorrows. View more poems at jeaniegreensfelder.com.

SPIRITUAL EMERGENCE OR SPIRITUAL EMERGENCY?

How you might help

© 2016 SHELLEY SCAMMELL, PSY.D.

It was my first silent retreat, and frankly, I was terrified. Sitting at the back of the hall, nicely comfy on my cushion, I was not sure how this all worked. Up at 4 am, breakfast at 6, lunch at II, and then no more food. Could I make it for a whole month? Everyone else seemed focused, able to sit for hours on end without problem. I was to learn later that many well-known meditation teachers were in that room, but at the time, I was just a beginner, out of my league. So during the hours of sitting, I opened my eyes and peaked, just every now and then. I watched the others when I couldn't focus anymore. And I started to notice a young woman, off to the left, halfway to the front. During the walking meditation she would seem a little 'off', and by the 4th day, she was looking very strange. Sitting long after the others got up, she never seemed to take a break. Day after day I got more concerned, until on day 6 I decided to break the silence and write a message to the staff of the retreat. I wasn't allowed to speak, but I could write. The next day she was gone from the hall. I saw her accompanied by staff members at all times, helping her walk, eat and even sleep. Later I was told that she was even being seen by a psychiatrist. I was so relieved she was getting the support she needed. This experience left an imprint on me, perhaps setting me up for my professional interest in spiritual emergence and spiritual emergency 20 years later. Yet, at the time, I was an English professor, not a psychologist. I had simply observed a person looking less and less 'right'. Only over time was I to unravel some of the mysteries of the meditation experience.

I myself left the retreat after 16 days, which I now know is impressive for a very first retreat. But please, don't do what I did. It is highly recommended to start meditation retreats in increments: first, practicing in 20 minute stretches, then sitting a few hours, perhaps participating in a daylong, building to a weekend retreat, then entering a week or 10 day retreat. Starting with a month-long retreat was absurd, but I had acted from ignorance. I was truly a novice. However, I learned a lot on that first retreat and have attended many others, yet none as challenging as that first.

Have you or someone you know had a spiritual or religious experience that was unique or even frightening? Participating in yoga, meditation, chi kung, contemplative prayer, visualization, hard-core physical training, medical procedures or even psychotherapy, amongst other possible activities, can cause some unexpected reactions. These reactions can range from blissful visions of the divine and deep calm to disturbing glimpses of demons or human suffering. While most of us enter these activities with the expectation of positive results, in truth, occasionally you, a family member, friend, client or patient may have an experience that is completely out of the ordinary. It may indeed shock or upset the experiencer, to the point of reaching out for help. If someone reaches out to you, how would you respond?

Perhaps like me in that first meditation retreat, you may know something's off but not know how to respond. Unless you've been trained in mental

The Wellspring Institute For Neuroscience and Contemplative Wisdom

The Institute is a 501c3 non-profit corporation, and it publishes the Wise Brain Bulletin. The Wellspring Institute gathers, organizes, and freely offers information and methods – supported by brain science and the contemplative disciplines – for greater happiness, love, effectiveness, and wisdom. For more information about the Institute, please go to http://www.wisebrain.org/wellspring-institute.

If you enjoy receiving the Wise Brain Bulletin, please consider making a tax-deductible donation to the Wellspring Institute. Simply visit WiseBrain.org and click on the Donate button. We thank you.

health or in the medical profession, you may feel stumped. Here are a few recommendations that anyone can do if handling a situation of spiritual emergency or spiritual emergency.

First, let me differentiate spiritual emergence from spiritual emergency

Spiritual Emergence: In most cases, spiritual emergence develops gradually, with a slow lifting of the veil between normal consciousness and spiritual awareness. Most traditions welcome a person's development of inner contact with the divine. Through well-worn paths, such as contemplative prayer, breathing techniques, daily prayer, holy days and rituals, yoga, meditative states, specific movements, amongst a myriad of other methods, people are encouraged to come into contact with the Divine, in whatever form. Inspired by the light they may experience, they may commit themselves more and more devoutly to a path. In the majority of cases, these internal and external shifts are supported sufficiently by their church, temple, house of worship, or community. However, now and then, people can experience overwhelm. This is called spiritual emergency. "Spiritual emergency," a term coined by Christina and Stanislav Grof (1986), refers to "a crisis involving religious, transpersonal, and/or spiritual issues that provides opportunities for growth" (Viggiano & Krippner 2010).

Spiritual Emergency: There are two major circumstances in which spiritual emergency happens. First, a person has no conceptual framework to deal with whatever is happening to him/her. At times, the person may reach out to his/her support system and unfortunately feel misunderstood or even judged by others, including friends, family members, doctors, therapists, counselors, or other support system members.

Secondly, a person may undergo a physical, emotional or psychic experience that is so overwhelming that their own system cannot handle it. Psychological structures may become disorganized as the personal self fragments. (Bragdon 1993, Cortwright 1997). This is the time that calling in an expert may be the wisest choice.

Let's say you have an experience where someone in your group is having a minor experience of upset, due to tai chi, meditation, yoga, or another form of practice. You may find yourself involved in some way, and here are some basic guidelines which may be of help. If a qualified professional is nearby, please ask him/her to step in and take over or lead the helping intervention. The teacher or leader should have some knowledge of these experiences and help guide the person. Yet sometimes, for various reasons, this doesn't happen. You may then step in carefully.

Larger picture support. At the very least, you might recommend that the person "stop" the activity, such as meditation, for a while, get plenty of sleep and rest, and eat 'heavier' foods, such as meat or vegetarian proteins. Slowing down or eliminating activating foods, such as sugar, caffeine, alcohol or any non-prescription drugs can help as well. Having other people nearby is important (vs. isolation) until the symptoms calm down, which allows a 'safe space' for the person while their system returns to a more balanced state. This can take hours, days, weeks or even months. Every situation is unique.

The above is the longer term solution, but what to do in the moment?

Immediate support. First, make sure the space in which you meet this person is completely safe. This may mean a private space off the main hall, or in a separate room. The entrance needs to be clear, so no-one can interrupt or disturb the person as you meet them. Making sure they are warm, perhaps with a blanket or enough heat, or on the other hand, cool, with air-conditioning. Giving the person a physical sense of comfort and safety is step number one. Others should not be entering and exiting while you and trusted others are working with the person.

Second, make your position clear. Let the person know who you are, how you can help, and what's expected. Don't overwhelm the person, but calmly and quietly support their process. Knowing who is around, and feeling physically safe and comfortable helps a person be in their own process.

Third, listen carefully to the person you are helping, verbally and non-verbally. Ask permission to be there. Sometimes a person will not know how to answer, or sometimes even talk. But, if they are speaking, simply sit and listen with open curiosity. Try to keep your mind open, rather than making judgments. This alone can be healing for others. You yourself may have experienced how much 'telling your story' to another compassionate being has helped, even when that person has no answers. Sincere listening can be a balm to the soul, especially when one is frightened or overwhelmed.

Fourth, light touch in some cases may help by providing some grounding. Be aware, however, that physically touching someone may be invasive or upsetting, so tread lightly. Gently touching someone's hand may help calm him/her during an upsetting time. Touch that is mild and completely non-sensual is key. It is essential to be responsive to what they say verbally and nonverbally. Of course in certain professions touch is now allowed. Follow the rules of your license.

There are a few things to consider when deciphering whether you are handling a spiritual emergence or spiritual emergency. This next section may be most relevant for a professionally trained counselor or medical personnel. Personally I know in that first retreat I would never have felt comfortable helping that young woman. I had no training or knowledge in the realm. But if you are trained, the following may be of use.

For Trained and Licensed Mental Health or Medical Professionals

About medications: Although there are cases where the use of psychotropic medications to help calm down the person may be the best choice, in most cases, it is wisest to let a person work through a spiritual emergence experience with physical, emotional and spiritual support alone. Historically, psychological theory and diagnostic classification systems have tended to either ignore or pathologize intense religious and spiritual experiences. There are numerous published accounts of individuals in the midst of intense religious and spiritual experiences that were misunderstood by mental health professionals; some have been hospitalized and medicated when less restrictive and more therapeutic interventions could have been utilized (Lukoff 2007).

In truth, mystical experiences can be highly adaptive, spurring on psychological maturation. In fact, one study showed that those reporting mystical experiences scored lower on psychopathology scales and higher on measures of psychological well-being than control subjects (Wulff 2000). Unless you trained in these realms, however, as MD's, psychologists, MFT's, social workers, nurses or other medically trained professionals, don't hesitate to refer to someone with more expertise if you feel at all uncomfortable or 'out of your league'.

How to Distinguish Between Spiritual Emergencies and Psychosis

Many of the symptoms outlined in the DSM-V definition of psychosis—or experiences mimicking them—can occur during a spiritual emergency or religious crisis. Because psychotic episodes often include religious or spiritual content, such as a person thinking he's Jesus, the devil, or a ghost or spirit, it can be difficult to differentiate these potentially long-term experiences from a temporary religious or spiritual experience. Here are some things to look for (based on Grof and Grof 1990):

I. Potential Medical Issues

Have you ruled out a physical disease, medication, or psychoactive substance that may be causing hallucinations or delusions with spiritual or religious content? All altered states of consciousness can be caused by medical conditions such as a tumor or infection in the brain, diseases of other organs, or electrolyte imbalances. Be sure to rule this out before proceeding to assess whether the material a client is presenting is spiritual/religious, psychopathological, or a blend of the two. Be aware that there are psychological correlates of organic impairments of the brain, such as problems with intellect and memory, clouded consciousness, difficulty with basic orientation, and poor coordination.

2. Level of Functioning

An important distinguishing quality of a psychotic episode is lacking the ability to handle everyday stressors like a forty-hour workweek, or to meet societal or familial responsibilities. On the other hand, clients experiencing spiritual emergencies may have temporary setbacks, during which they drop out of normal functioning as they take time to integrate the experience, but they generally return to a full life. Look for level of functioning, currently and historically. Is the client capable of handling her daily life while continuing her religious or spiritual practices?

Notice the quality of relationships the person has with her family and friends. If she's generally able to manage life and sustain relationships, this portends well for her ability to return to normalcy. Alternatively, does she seem to be spiraling out of control? Be sure to note whether she has a history of serious difficulties in interpersonal relationships, an inability to make friends and have intimate relationships, or poor social adjustment—all signs of a history of psychiatric problems that make it more likely that her issues are psychiatric in nature.

3. Finding Meaning in the Experience

Religious or spiritual issues are more likely to present with some sense of meaning, whereas lack of insight, purpose, or meaning is a hallmark of psychiatric issues. Is the person finding meaning in his experience? Does he have insights into the process that may be healing in nature,

Perspectives on Self-Care

Be careful with all self-help methods (including those presented in this Bulletin), which are no substitute for working with a licensed healthcare practitioner. People vary, and what works for someone else may not be a good fit for you. When you try something, start slowly and carefully, and stop immediately if it feels bad or makes things worse.

including change and development of personal life themes? Or is there a lack of meaning in his description, perhaps demonstrated by repetitive or circular thinking patterns or compulsions that don't seem to have a purpose? A notable difference is often the quality of the experience, vision, or voice. A healthier outcome can be expected if the vision is positive, loving, or at least nonthreatening. With experiences of a negative nature, the likelihood of a return to normal healthy functioning is lower. Although there are situations where negative forms of experience are positively integrated into people's life experience, this scenario seems to be more challenging and less likely (Betty 2012; Mercer 2013; Zuk & Zuk 1998).

4. Coherence

Religious, spiritual, or mystical experiences may be unfamiliar, distressing, or even frightening, but they tend to be more coherent than not, whereas psychotic or manic episodes are characterized by a lack of coherence. Can the person talk about her spiritual or religious experience, and life more generally, in a coherent fashion that weaves together her values and lifestyle? Or does she seem disjointed when telling you her current situation or life story? Ultimately, a spiritual or religious experience will eventually be integrated, with the visions, voices, and trance states subsiding and being understood within the context of the person's life. Unfortunately, an organic psychosis, on the other hand, probably won't take that course. It may leave a person disabled for a lengthy period of time, maybe a lifetime, and typically disrupts a person's life in negative ways, rather than illuminating it.

5. Capacity for Self-Reflection

A person experiencing a religious or spiritual problem is more likely to be able to report that he's having difficulty functioning, whereas those with psychiatric issues often lack insight or blame others or circumstances for their difficulties. If a person perceives the world and other people as hostile, such as having a deep mistrust of others, delusions of persecution, or acoustic hallucinations of enemies (voices) with a very unpleasant content, his experience is probably maladaptive and requires psychiatric intervention. When the process is more intrapsychic and contained, it is more likely to be a religious or spiritual issue.

6. Circumstances of Onset

In the case of spiritual emergencies, the onset of the symptoms is likely to have been triggered by identifiable circumstances. If the person was holding down a full-time job or attending school full-time and had a sudden shift in consciousness after an event that could be considered a stressor (such as the loss of a loved one, near-death experience, or a spiritual or religious event such as a shamanic journey), you may want to hold off on assuming that she's psychotic. Instead, you might monitor closely over time to see what happens. Seemingly psychotic behavior could be temporary.

7. Duration

Psychiatric issues can be either chronic or acute, and a spiritual or religious transformation may take weeks, months, or even years to fully comprehend and integrate into a new worldview. If the issues have been present for a short period of time, they may call for different interventions than if they're chronic. For example, if a young man suddenly begins to claim that he's a reincarnation of Jesus without prior symptoms, it could be either a facet of a spiritual emergency or a first break (the first time psychotic symptoms are detected). However, if a person reports this repeatedly over a number of years, your assessment might lean toward a psychiatric problem. Assess how the client is integrating his experiences into his current and future life plans. Is the process of integration within normal limits, or are his attempts to adjust negatively impacting his current life functioning or future plans?

8. Knowledge About the Experience

Sometimes clients may present with religious or spiritual issues that they've never heard of anyone else having, so they don't even have words for what they're experiencing, whether it be a "crisis of faith," a "dark night of the soul," or a "kundalini awakening." For such clients, learning more about others who have had such experiences and how they dealt with them can go a long way toward alleviating distress, fear, guilt, or embarrassment. Does she have contact with an expert in this realm, or access to books, websites, and other resources that describe or explain what may be occurring? Is she interested in investigating how others may have traveled similar paths? Some self-centeredness or feeling of being unique is natural in these processes, but focusing too much and for too long on oneself can be isolating and detrimental.

9. Social Context

One thing that can be very important to assess when a client presents with spiritual or religious issues is whether he's isolated in his experiences, beliefs, and practices, or whether he has family support, social support, or both. Does he have a community with which he can share what's happening, or is he feeling alone? If he's isolated, is that something he describes as contributing to his journey or as hindering it? Knowing whether this person is more isolated or has family or social support may influence your choice of intervention (Grof & Grof 1990). In some cases, you might encourage the person to seek support and share what's going on with trusted others. However, some people prefer solitude in these situations because they feel overwhelmed or vulnerable in the presence of others.

One last thing: The term "spiritual bypassing" (Welwood 1984) has been used to describe another problematic factor with SRBPs: unhealthy misuse of religious or spiritual practices or terminology to avoid dealing with important psychological issues or problems with relationships or global functioning (Cashwell, Bentley, & Yarborough 2007; Cortright 1997; Welwood 2000). Finally, religious and spiritual struggles in and of themselves may require informed interventions (Exline, Grubbs, & Homolka 2014; Exline & Rose 2005; Lukoff, Lu, & Turner 1992; Lukoff, Lu, & Yang 2011). Clearly, both positive and dysfunctional forms of religious and spiritual involvement are important for professionals and even some lay people to recognize and address.

The nine lines of inquiry outlined above can help you determine whether you should treat the issues a person presents as a religious or spiritual problem (DSMV code Z65.8), a psychiatric problem, or a blend of the two. They will also help you understand the context and severity of the issues. You also may encounter cases that have elements of both psychopathology and religion or spirituality; it's not an either-or proposition. And even when you utilize the nine lines of inquiry above, it can be difficult to disentangle spiritual and religious experiences from manic or psychotic symptoms. If you find yourself having difficulty determining whether a client is experiencing a spiritual emergency or a psychotic break, seek consultation or make a referral to a clinician who's proficient in working with spiritual or religious issues.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Shelley Scammell, PsyD is co-author of Spiritual and Religious Competencies in Clinical Practice: Guidelines for Psychotherapists and Mental Health Professionals (2015). She is adjunct faculty at the California Institute of Integral Studies, San Francisco and has worked in private practice in the San Francisco Bay Area for 15 years. Her specialty is differentiating spiritual emergence and emergency, and with co-author Cassi Vieten, PhD formulated the 16 research based competencies in this book while serving as co-presidents of the Institute for Spirituality and Psychology. Scammellconsulting.com.

REFERENCES

Ano, G. G., & Vasconcelles, E. B. 2005. Religious coping and psychological adjustment to stress: A meta-analysis. Journal of Clinical Psychology 61 (4): 461–480.

Arredondo, P., Toporek, R., Brown, S. P., Jones, J., Locke, D. C., Sanchez, J., et al. 1996. Operationalization of the multicultural counseling competencies. Journal of Multicultural Counseling and Development 24(1): 42–78. doi:10.1002/j.2161-1912.1996.tb00288.x.

Bragdon, Emma, PhD. 1993. A Sourcebook for Helping People with Spiritual Problems. Vermont: Lightening Up Press.

Brewerton, T. D. 1994. Hyperreligiosity in psychotic disorders. The Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease 182(5): 302–304.

Cashwell, C. S., Bentley, P. B., & Yarborough, J. 2007. The only way out is through: The peril of spiritual bypass. Counseling and Values 51(2): 139–148.

Cornah, D. 2006. The impact of spirituality on mental health: A review of the literature. Retrieved November 24, 2014, from http://www.mentalhealth.org.uk/content/assets/PDF/publications/impact-spirituality.pdf?view=Standard.

Cortright, R. 1997. Psychotherapy and spirit: Theory and practice in transpersonal psychotherapy. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Delaney, H. D., Forcehimes, A. A., Campbell, W. P., & Smith, B. W. 2009. Integrating spirituality into alcohol treatment. Journal of Clinical Psychology 65(2): 185–198.

Delaney, H. D., Miller, W. R., & Bisono, A. M. 2007. Religiosity and spirituality among psychologists: A survey of clinician members of the American Psychological Association. Professional Psychology: Research and Practice 38(5): 538–546.

Exline, J. J., Grubbs, J. B., & Homolka, S. J. 2014. Seeing God as cruel or distant: Links with divine struggles involving anger, doubt, and fear of God's disapproval. International Journal for the Psychology of Religion, published online November 17.

Exline, J. J., & Rose, E. 2005. Religious and spiritual struggles. In R. F. Paloutzian and C. L. Park (Eds.), Handbook of the psychology of religion and spirituality (pp. 315–330). New York: Guilford.

Exline, J. J., Yali, A. M., & Lobel, M. 1999. When God disappoints: Difficulty forgiving God and its role in negative emotion. Journal of Health Psychology 4(3): 365–379.

Fredrickson, B. L. 2002. How does religion benefit health and well-being?: Are positive emotions active ingredients? Psychological Inquiry 13(3): 209–213.

Fry, P. S. 2000. Religious involvement, spirituality, and personal meaning for life: Existential predictors of psychological wellbeing in community-residing and institutional care elders. Aging and Mental Health 4(4): 375–387. doi:10.1080/713649965.

Fukuyama, M. A., & Sevig, T. D. 2002. Spirituality in counseling across cultures. In P. B. Pedersen, J. G. Draguns, W. R. Lonner & J. E. Trimble (Eds.), Counseling across cultures (pp. 273–295). Thousand Oaks: Sage.

Green, M., & Elliott, M. 2010. Religion, health, and psychological well-being. Journal of Religion and Health 49(2): 149–163. doi:10.1007/s10943-009-9242-1.

Greenberg, D., Witztum, E., & Pisante, J. 1987. Scrupulosity: Religious attitudes and clinical presentations. British Journal of Medical Psychology 60(1): 29–37. doi:10.1111/j.2044-8341.1987.tb02714.x.

Grof, C., & Grof, S. 1986. Spiritual emergency: The understanding and treatment of transpersonal crises. ReVision 8(2): 7–20.

Grof, C., & Grof, S. 1990. The stormy search for the self: A guide to personal growth through transformational crisis. Los Angeles: J. P. Tarcher.

Hathaway, W. L., Scott, S.Y., & Garver, S. A. 2004. Assessing religious/spiritual functioning: A neglected domain in clinical practice? Professional Psychology: Research and Practice 35(1): 97–104.

King, M., Marston, L., McManus, S., Brugha, T., Meltzer, H., & Bebbington, P. 2013. Religion, spirituality, and mental health: Results from a national study of English households. British Journal of Psychiatry 202(1): 68–73. doi:10.1192/bjp.bp.112.112003.

Koenig, H. G., King, D., & Carson, V. B. 2012. Handbook of religion and health. New York: Oxford University Press.

Lindeman, M., & Aarnio, K. 2007. Superstitious, magical, and paranormal beliefs: An integrative model. Journal of Research in Personality 41(4): 731–744. doi:10.1016/j.jrp.2006.06.009.

Linehan, M. M. 1993. Cognitive-behavioral treatment of borderline personality disorder. New York: Guilford.

Lukoff, D., Lu, F., & Turner, R. 1992. Toward a more culturally sensitive DSM-IV: Psychoreligious and psychospiritual problems. Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease 180(11): 673–682.

Lukoff, D. 2007. Spirituality in the recovery from persistent mental disorders. Southern Medical Journal 100(6): 642–646.

Lukoff, D., Lu, F. G., & Yang, C. P. 2011. DSM-IV religious and spiritual problems. In R. J. Peteet, F. G. Lu, and W. E. Narrow (Eds.), Religious and spiritual issues in psychiatric diagnosis: A Research Agenda for DSM-V. Washington, DC: American Psychiatric Publishing.

Magaldi-Dopman, D., & Park-Taylor, J. 2010. Sacred adolescence: Practical suggestions for psychologists working with adolescents' religious and spiritual identity. Professional Psychology: Research and Practice 41(5): 382–390.

Maslow, A. H. 1970. Religions, values, and peak-experiences. New York: Viking Press.

McNamara, P., Burns, J. P., Johnson, P., & McCorkle, B. H. 2010. Personal religious practice, risky behavior, and implementation intentions among adolescents. Psychology of Religion and Spirituality 2(1): 30–34. doi:10.1037/a0017582.

Mercer, J. 2013. Deliverance, demonic possession, and mental illness: Some considerations for mental health professionals. Mental Health, Religion, and Culture 16(6): 595–611. doi:10.1080/13674676.20 12.706272.

Miller, W. R., & Thoresen, C. E. 2003. Spirituality, religion, and health. American Psychologist 58(1): 24–35.

Oman, D., & Thoresen, C. E. 2005. Do religion and spirituality influence health? In R. F. Paloutzian & C. L. Park (Eds.), Handbook of the psychology of religion and spirituality (pp. 435–459). New York: Guilford.

Pargament, K. I. 1997. The psychology of religion and coping: Theory, research and practice. New York: Guilford.

Pargament, K. I., & Sweeney, P. J. 2011. Building spiritual fitness in the army: An innovative approach to a vital aspect of human development. American Psychologist 66(1): 58–64.

Pargament, K. I., Ano, G. G., & Wachholtz, A. B. 2005. The religious dimension of coping: Advances in theory, research, and practice. In R. F. Paloutzian & C. L. Park (Eds.), Handbook of the psychology of religion and spirituality (pp. 479–495). New York: Guilford.

Pargament, K. I., Mahoney, A., Exline, J., Jones, J., & Shafranske, E. P. 2013. Envisioning an integrative paradigm for the psychology of religion and spirituality.

In K. I. Pargament (Ed.). APA handbook of psychology, religion, and spirituality: Vol. 1. Context, theory, and research (pp. 3–19). Washington, DC: American Psychological Association.

Pargament, K. I., & Raiya, H. A. 2007. A decade of research on the psychology of religion and coping. Psyke and Logos 28(2): 742–766.

Park, C. L. 2005. Religion as a meaning-making framework in coping with life stress. Journal of Social Issues 61(4): 707–729.

Powell, L. H., Shahabi, L., & Thoresen, C. E. 2003. Religion and spirituality: Linkages to physical health. American Psychologist 58(1): 36–52.

Rosenfeld, G.W. 2010. Identifying and integrating helpful and harmful religious beliefs into psychotherapy. Psychotherapy: Theory, Research, and Practice Training 47(4): 512–526.

Rogers, S. A., Poey, E. L., Reger, G. M., Tepper, L., & Coleman, E. M. 2002. Religious coping among those with persistent mental illness. International Journal for the Psychology of Religion 12(3): 161–175. doi:10.1207/S15327582IJPR1203_03.

Saunders, S. M., Miller, M. L., & Bright, M. M. 2010. Spiritually Conscious Psychological Care. Professional Psychology: Research and Practice 41(5), 355-362.

Tepper, L., Rogers, S. A., Coleman, E. M., & Malony, H. N. 2001. The prevalence of religious coping among persons with persistent mental illness. Psychiatric Services 52(5). doi:10.1176/appi.ps.52.5.660.

Vieten, C., Scammell, S.,., Pilato, R., Ammondson, I., Pargament, K.I., Lukoff, D 2013. Spiritual and religious competencies for psychologists. Psychology of Religion and Spirituality 5(3): 129-144.

Vieten, C., Scammell, S., Pierce, A., Pilato, R., Ammondson, I., Pargament, Kl, Lukoff, D. 2016. Spiritual and religious competencies for psychologists (II). Spirituality in Clinical Practice. (in print)

Viggiano, D. B., & Krippner, S. 2010. The Grofs' model of spiritual emergency in retrospect: Has it stood the test of time? International Journal of Transpersonal Studies 29(1): 118–127.

Welwood, J. 1984. Principles of inner work: Psychological and spiritual. Journal of Transpersonal Psychology 16(1): 63–73.

Welwood, J. 2000. Toward a psychology of awakening: Buddhism, psychotherapy, and the path of personal and spiritual transformation. Boston, MA: Shambhala.

Wulff, D. M. 2000. Mystical experience. In E. Cardeña, S. J. Lynn, & S. Krippner (Eds.), Varieties of anomalous experience: Examining the scientific evidence (pp. 397–440). Washington, DC: American Psychological Association.

Zuk, G. H., & Zuk, C.V. 1998. Projection, double bind, and demonic possession: Some common elements in three theories of psychosis. Contemporary Family Therapy: An International Journal 20(1): 15–23.

SKILLFUL MEANS

Your Skillful Means, sponsored by the Wellspring Institute, is designed to be a comprehensive resource for people interested in personal growth, overcoming inner obstacles, being helpful to others, and expanding consciousness. It includes instructions in everything from common psychological tools for dealing with negative self talk, to physical exercises for opening the body and clearing the mind, to meditation techniques for clarifying inner experience and connecting to deeper aspects of awareness, and much more.

Mountain Meditation

Purpose/Effects

Often we can feel ungrounded, fearful, or even paralyzed in the face of difficult emotions and life circumstances. The Mountain Meditation is designed to cultivate stillness and calm and to connect with our inner strength and stability in the face of internal and external challenges.

Method

Summary

Sit, envisioning and then embodying a mountain as you meditate.

Long Version

- Take a seated position that is comfortable for you on the floor or in a chair.
- After following your breath for a few rounds, vividly imagine the most beautiful mountain you know of and resonate with. Envision its various details and stable, unmoving presence grounded in the earth.
- After a few minutes of developing and holding this clear image in your mind, imagine bringing the mountain inside yourself and becoming the mountain
- Imagine yourself sitting stillness and in calm, simply observing and resting unwavering as the various weather patterns, storms, and seasons pass the before you.
- Just as a mountain endures constant changes and extremes, we also experience various

- thoughts, emotions and life challenges. Imagine viewing these experiences as external, fleeting and impersonal events, akin to weather patterns.
- Feel yourself unwavering and rooted in stillness amidst the constant change in your internal and external experience.
- This meditation is designed to last about 20 minutes but can be shortened or extended based on the practitioner's preference.

History

Adapted from a meditation created by Jon Kabat-Zinn, founder of the Center for Mindfulness in Medicine, Health Care and Society and mindfulness-based stress reduction (MBSR).

Notes

An audio recording of the Mountain meditation can be found here.

SEE ALSO

Equanimity Meditation

Fare Well

May you and all beings be happy, loving, and wise.