LET GO OF NEEDLESS FEAR

It’s normal to be cautious or nervous around other people. For example, if somebody disagrees with you in a meeting, you might feel uneasy and worried about what others think: Was I too pushy? Does my boss like me? Do they think I’m not very smart? When you get home later that day, let’s say your teenage son is quiet and prickly, as usual. You want to tell him that the chilly distance between you feels awful, and you want to open your heart to him . . . but it feels awkward, you’re afraid of making things worse, and when you spoke from the heart while growing up it did not go well, so you say nothing, again.

Other social anxieties include fears about your appearance, public speaking, talking with authority figures, or being around people who aren’t like you. Sometimes these fears are justified. Someone might actually want to pressure, hurt, or exploit you. Safety is our most fundamental need, and it’s vital to be clear-eyed about threats and skillful in dealing with them. Nonetheless, many of our fears around other people are not actually justified. They don’t really care about what we did or, if they do, it’s a passing feeling.

And if you’re facing a genuine threat, you can be determined and confident without being anxious about it. Anxiety is something that’s added to our responses. Sometimes it’s helpful, but so often it clouds our thinking, compounds suffering, and worsens conflicts with others. We can have too little or too much anxiety around other people. Which is more common?

It’s the second one: needless anxiety stirred into the sauce of life, making it bitter.

How

Anxiety can become chronic, a kind of habit, and hard to budge. People can even be anxious about not being anxious, since then they might lower their guard, and get hurt again. It’s important to realize that you can be alert and strong about potential threats while not feeling anxious.

Be aware of the costs of unnecessary—not informative, not useful—anxiety. Besides feeling bad, it makes us play smaller with others, hold back what we really feel, and hunker down—or get combative. Decide in your heart if you want to be free of worthless fears.

Let Go of Paper Tiger Paranoia

It helps to understand why the nervous system is so easily hijacked by alarm. To keep our ancestors alive, Mother Nature developed a brain that tends to overestimate threats, underestimate opportunities, and underestimate resources to deal with threats and fulfill opportunities. This is good for survival in life-or-death conditions, but it’s lousy for well-being and fulfilling relationships. It’s not our fault that we’re needlessly anxious. But it is our responsibility—and our opportunity—to address it.

So, whenever something seems threatening to you - such as what you think might happen if you were more vulnerable, emotional, or assertive with someone - ask yourself:
• Am I overestimating this threat?
• Am I underestimating the opportunities here?
• Am I underestimating the resources—both inside me and around me—for dealing with this threat and capitalizing on these opportunities?

This stepping back to understand your own mind can immediately help you feel less anxious.

Recognize Your Turbochargers

Consider the life that you’ve had, especially your childhood, and what has been threatening, scary, even traumatic about it. How have you learned to deal with threats and manage anxiety? These lessons might have been helpful at the time, but now they are lodged in the body like turbochargers, distorting your perceptions, speeding up and tilting your emotions, and driving your impulses and actions. Take a little time to make a list of your own “turbochargers.” As you become more aware of them, they’ll have less power over you. You can talk to yourself in wise ways like these: This is not junior high school . . . He is not my dad . . . What they said was critical, but it was not a horrible attack . . . I have not been totally rejected, even though it feels like that . . . These hurt feelings are mainly old emotional memories, not based on what is true here and now.

Don’t Be Afraid

Bring to mind someone you know cares about you, and try saying to yourself: I know you’re not going to attack me. Find your way to having the statement ring true, and then see how you feel. Do it again with this statement to yourself: Even if you did attack me, I would still be OK in the core of my being. Let the truth of this and related good feelings sink into you. Here’s another one: I can take care of myself when I am with you. Let this, too, sink in. And: If you hurt me, I’ll still be OK in my core. And: I wish you well. If you have any difficulty with this practice, try it with other people who love you. Draw on the sense of calm strength that we’ve previously explored. Try to feel your way into a place in which you recognize others and situations as they truly are, you take care of your own needs, and no needless anxiety is added.
Next, do this practice by bringing a friend to mind . . . and then do it with a neutral person . . . and then with someone who is challenging for you. If there is truly something to be anxious about, so be it. Otherwise, keep opening to the experience of being realistic about others and strong on your own behalf—without feeling any pointless fear.

Try this approach while actively interacting with others. Can you talk with a family member, a friend, a neutral person, and a challenging person without one bit of unnecessary worry, alarm, or uneasiness? As you deepen your sense of being appropriately fearless with others, keep letting this experience sink in so you become increasingly grounded in this way of being.

Enjoy the sense of freedom this practice brings, the greater ease with others, the confidence. Notice how you can be more relaxed, patient, open, and caring with other people when you are not afraid.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Rick Hanson, Ph.D. is a psychologist, Senior Fellow at UC Berkeley’s Greater Good Science Center and New York Times best-selling author. His books have been published in 30 languages and include Making Great Relationships, Neurodharma, Resilient, Hardwiring Happiness, Just One Thing, Buddha’s Brain, and Mother Nurture – with over a million copies in English alone. His free newsletters have 250,000 subscribers and his online programs have scholarships available for those with financial needs. He’s lectured at NASA, Google, Oxford, and Harvard, and taught in meditation centers worldwide. An expert on positive neuroplasticity, his work has been featured on CBS, NPR, the BBC, and other major media. He began meditating in 1974 and is the founder of the Wellspring Institute for Neuroscience and Contemplative Wisdom. He and his wife live in northern California and have two adult children. He loves wilderness and taking a break from emails.
He found me on the floor. My three cup coffee buzz faded hours ago and my arms were covered in a crusty layer of baby vomit. My husband Mike, a physician, came home from the hospital after a seventeen hour shift. The last thing he wanted to hear was, “I’m not meant to be a mother.”

My six week old infant was throwing up my breast milk for weeks. I tried to fix it but it only seemed to get worse. He wailed all evening—this after his two year old sister had been tugging at me all day. She cried sweetly, “I want to be held,” but all I wanted was to snuggle into bed, throw a pillow over my head, and close my eyes. This whining-vomit-fest was my daily routine like the 90’s film Groundhog Day where actor Bill Murray relives the same day over and over. There’s got to be a better way.

I wasn’t alone. Over 3.5 million parents in the United States suffer from parental burnout. According to Dr. Moira Mikolajczak this is not normal parenting stress, but a “chronic imbalance of risks over resources [and] a state of intense exhaustion related to one’s parental role.” It can lead to a mother feeling inadequate and detached from her children.¹

Inadequate is putting it lightly. I felt like a failure. Was this payback for glaring at parents on airplanes with seat-kicking toddlers?

It wasn’t. We’re living in a broken system. People used to get the work done and care for children together—in small hunter-gatherer groups. Homo sapiens have been around for 300,000 years while farming in towns and cities for only 10,000 years. And the first industrial revolution happened less than 300 years ago. This is a rapid transformation for a species. One of the biggest changes occurred in the last two decades: we have been physically separated from one another—by screens. We’re separated by screens at work, we’re separated by screens at school. It’s even happened in our neighborhoods. I can’t even knock on a neighbor’s door before texting to come over or they think I’m a weirdo.

I looked around the room at my gadgets: a baby monitor, a sound machine, the latest baby swing, and a hospital-grade breast pump that quietly whooshed. For having so much—why do I feel so crummy? Compared to mothers in any other time in history, I had access to the most knowledge. The list of books and websites on potty training, breastfeeding, disciplining children, and getting my body back is endless. However, they are no substitute for a home cooked meal and a pair of hands to hold my baby while I shower—and believe me, I needed a shower.

Bearing and raising children is natural. But we didn’t evolve to do it in isolation. I began a quest for connecting with other moms. On walks I’d call out to other pregnant women pushing strollers, “Hey! You have a kid; I have a kid. Give me your number so we can hang out!”

---

Although connecting with other moms seemed to be a good solution, no one had time for it. "Gosh, I'd love to get together, but we have soccer today." This time-poor, too-busy-for-anything suffering got a name: burnout.

But that name doesn’t help—it implies that the moms can’t hack it. Psychiatrist Dr. Wendy Dean says “this isn’t burnout” it is a betrayal. The word burnout places the blame on individuals instead of the lack of supportive socioeconomic structures.

It's hard to understand why there is a problem. Maternal and infant mortality rates are lower, food is abundant, and creature comforts are provided through the press of a button. Yet our social structures do not bolster families. A few state programs address the problem with paid family leave, early childcare education, healthcare, or mental health support. However these programs are unavailable or subpar for most families.

The United States is the only industrialized country that doesn’t mandate paid family leave. This forces one in four women to go back to work only two weeks after giving birth. And this shortsighted lack of national policy has damaging effects. Brief maternal leave is linked to higher rates of maternal stress, depression, and worse outcomes for infants and children. I couldn’t imagine going back to work two weeks after giving birth. In fact, I was lucky to be alive. Twelve days after my son was born, I nearly died from a severe postpartum hemorrhage. After a 9-1-1 call, emergency surgery, and two blood transfusions, I'm still here.

The aftercare I received was typical, a comprehensive exam at six weeks. According to the ten question Edinburgh Postnatal Depression Scale, I didn’t have postpartum depression. I was cleared to start exercising and having sex—I didn’t perceive this as good news because I wasn’t ready to get back on that horse yet. Nonetheless, I was sent on my merry way to carry on with the joys of motherhood. Good luck, mama bear!

Five months after Mike found me on the floor, I was still breastfeeding and home alone with the kids. I'd hum to calm myself in the mornings as both babies screamed at me during diaper changes. My hair was falling out, my skin was peeling off my fingers, and eating ice cream was my only pleasure. I was desperate for guidance.

Then one day I found the book Mother Nurture by Dr. Rick Hanson, Jan Hanson, and Dr. Ricki Pollycove. I barely had time to sit without a baby in my arms, let alone read, but I had to try something. Right from the first page, I felt like I was with a best friend who understood how I was feeling. Finally!

First off, this thing has a name. Hanson calls it Depleted Mother Syndrome—“a biophysical condition in which the accumulation of a mother’s outpouring, stresses, vulnerabilities, and low resources drain and dysregulate her body.” Hormonal shifts, nutritional needs, sleep deprivation, changes in identity, and increased responsibilities become a heavy burden on a mother who protects and cares for the most vulnerable among us, children. But who looks out for mom?

The goal of Mother Nurture is to restore balance to a mother’s mind, body, and intimate relationships. Depleted Mother Syndrome (DMS) is insidious. The months or years of energetic and physical outpouring from a mother add up to a chronically depleted state that is distinct from postpartum depression—and it’s just as true for women who have not given birth to their child. The risks are higher with more children, longer breastfeeding, being an older mom, traumatic births, or when the baby has health problems.

Once I got my hands on the book, I resolved to get my physical health back. A quick glance at my DMS risk factors told the tale: one miscarriage-check, two complicated deliveries-check-plus-check, older mom-check, infant needed emergency surgery-check, extended breastfeeding-check, alone with two children-check. Yikes! I was deep in the land of depletion. And the coup de grâce—all of my family lived out of state. The so-called “village it takes to raise a child” was for me—like so many mothers—more like a ghost town.

Step one was getting more sleep. Sleep deprivation can impair the immune system, gastrointestinal system, memory, concentration, and mood. For our first baby, I took the overnight shifts since Mike was going to work all day. I was able to sleep when the baby slept. A second child doubles the workload. In order to get more sleep, I had to ask for help.

---

Asking for help is not intuitive. In fact, it seems ingrained in our culture that the best moms don’t need help. Even mothers who out-earn their husbands take on more household chores. Eve Rodsky, author of the book Fair Play, warns about internalizing toxic messages like “it’s on me” to take all the nightly wake-ups or “I can do it better” than my husband when it comes to laundry. Perfectionism was choking me. When I reduced my expectations of being a super mom, I could breathe again. Maybe I can give formula to my baby, let the house get a little messy, or let others cook for me when they come to town? And since Mike seemed eager, why not let him help?

As I began to create small pockets of time, I found I still could not sleep. I rode a thought merry-go-round. Are the doors locked? I shouldn’t have eaten so many cookies today. Why does it feel like I don’t have friends anymore? Fortunately there is a way to steady the wandering mind.

I began to use techniques from Mother Nurture: meditating for one to five minutes before bed, relaxing by watching my baby sleep, and even extending compassion towards my partner during hard times. As an example I would close my eyes, bring Mike to mind. May he be healthy, may he not suffer, may he be at peace. This lovingkindness mediation seems trivial in theory, but it is powerful in practice.

Routines that foster good sleep are also a practice. This is called sleep hygiene. I limited nightly screen time, avoided aggravating tasks or arguments before bed, and cut down caffeine. I kept the room dark during nighttime diaper changes which allowed me to get back to sleep faster. Light stimulates the brain and increases wakefulness for parents and baby. Finally, my husband took on part of the night shift so I could get uninterrupted sleep.

---

It worked. I started to feel better and could look at my other problems, such as mood, skin, and concentration. It was time to face my poor diet—the life-sucking chore of difficult choices. I just wanted a chimichanga and a margarita. But I knew I could do better. I was eating mostly white carbs. It didn’t start out that way. My son threw up my breast milk for six months straight. I followed the advice of the pediatrician to give up soy, dairy, and eggs. It didn’t help me or my son. Mike repeatedly asked, “Are you sure you don’t want to work with that nutritionist we know? She said her speciality is helping mothers.” I didn’t. I really didn’t. But after reading Mother Nurture, I finally gave in.

It was overwhelming, so I cleaned up one meal at a time. I cut down white flour carbs and refined sugars and added high quality fats (like avocados), protein, fresh veggies, and supplements. My mood, skin, and hair thanked me.

The changes snowballed. I read. I studied. I developed confidence in advocating for my health. I asked my doctor for additional tests that had not been offered. I was on a pathway to wellness. Next up: stress.

My best friend said being a mom meant she was always “on the clock.” There was no more going out for a quick run or coffee with a friend. There was always a partner or babysitter staring at their watch waiting for her return. But what can we do when we are surprised with a free moment?
Mother Nurture suggests 1, 5, 15, 30, and 60 minute soothers activities. Having this list ready to go reduces the cognitive load of figuring out how to calm myself when I already feel flooded. Here are some of my favorite examples from the book—soothers based on time constraints:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Time</th>
<th>Activity</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1 Minute</td>
<td>splash water on your face, hug your partner or child, take 4 deep slow breaths while imagining stress leaving your body, smell something good, or rub your feet</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5 Minutes</td>
<td>have a cup of tea, go outside and watch the birds, listen to a favorite song, or do a few stretches</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15 Minutes</td>
<td>meditate, go for a short walk, dance/stretch, read a magazine, or take a shower</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30 Minutes</td>
<td>call a friend, take a nap, read a book, play an instrument, or take a long bath</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1 Hour</td>
<td>take yourself out for a meal, go for a hike, browse a bookstore, or my favorite—go to a yoga class.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The book suggests relaxation techniques (tensing and releasing each part of your body, one at a time), acknowledging feelings (I’m upset right now, I feel tightness in my chest), or taking in the good (relishing in your baby’s smile or a warm comfortable bed). These simple shifts of coming back into the present really calmed me.

To this day I like to imagine myself as a child to soften my harsh inner critic. I tell myself that I am allowed to make mistakes and am still learning. It’s ok if I don’t do every task skillfully. There is always room to grow. I also make space to grieve the lost pieces of who I used to be in order to bloom into the person I am becoming.

Change is not linear and it’s sometimes painful. I discovered my sadness. My vivacious personality and fun spirit had been extinguished by the endless loop of schlepping the kids around, washing diapers, doing dishes, going for groceries. I no longer saw a future self—a problem that I never had before. I felt this intensely when meeting new people and they’d inevitably ask, “What do YOU do, Renee?” I hate that question. Saying, “I’m at home raising my kids,” left me feeling worthless.

Women are hard on themselves, shouldering their list of “shoulds.” Dr. Pooja Lakshmin says, “women have internalized a culture that demands they bear the brunt of caregiving while simultaneously devaluing that job.”

face a no-win situation where they feel guilty for working and not being with their child. But then if they stay at home they feel guilty for not bringing home the bacon. Is earning money the only thing that makes a person productive?

The dissonance felt balancing family with work seems to worsen parental burnout. Anne Crittendon states in her book The Price of Motherhood, “Individuals who assume the role of nurturer are punished and discouraged from performing the very tasks that everyone agrees are essential. We talk endlessly about the importance of family, yet the work it takes to make a family is utterly disregarded.”

I didn’t feel valuable the way I did when I first met my husband. Sure, my life was filled with a deep purpose to serve my children and family, but I felt like I had to make myself very small to attend to the wants and needs of three people and a dog. I often woke up in a sweat from a recurring nightmare of Mike divorcing me. I was no longer the woman he married. And the divide between us was growing.

If there was a better way to parent together while still enjoying the love we had when we first got married, then I needed to find it. We had gone deep into what Hanson calls our “practical partnership,” but we had lost our “intimate friendship.” Communication was tense, even to the point of us snapping at each other regularly. This was new and started after having children.

Partners can start by connecting—to their breath, to knowing that they are on the same team, and to a sense of feeling loved. They can also lead with the positive—the aspect of the relationship or person that is praiseworthy. So instead of piercing Mike with my eye daggers for leaving a crusty oatmeal bowl in the sink, I bravely decided to have a conversation about it. That’s right, I said bravely, because these talks are hard especially when things have been tense. But first, I led with how I appreciated that Mike fed our toddler and played with her while I napped with the baby.

A subtle change in communication is powerful. I started to listen with curiosity during a conflict. It turned out that Mike valued that I kept the house clean; he just hadn’t known how upset I would get about dishes in the sink. We made a plan for me to alter my expectations of when dishes needed to be done and for him to make a better effort to keep things tidy. Open communication seemed to be the way forward.

---

14 Crittenden, A. (2010). The price of motherhood: Why the most important job in the world is still the least valued. Picador.
Style and tone can make a big difference when communicating. My way is busy and boisterous, so I had to slow down. Mike tends to speak more thoughtfully and dislikes being interrupted mid-thought. This was a tough adjustment because I was raised in a family that talks over each other, gets louder, and attempts to finish each other’s sentences.

Hanson says to approach a conversation with empathy for your partner: I have a tendency to take things personally, but the truth is that my husband is never trying to deliberately hurt my feelings. He is my partner, he loves me, and I love him. It was helpful to talk about conflict using “we” statements rather than “you” statements. “We care about our kids staying healthy and having good oral hygiene, so can we find a system that ensures the kids get their teeth flossed and brushed every night?”

Partners can get closer by defining their values. What matters for you as a couple? Is it your health, family time, patience, empathy, or maybe spirituality? If Mike plays with the kids while I make dinner, I value the alone time to center myself and he values the healthy meal. We all value family time delivered through Mike’s collection of very popular physical games he plays with the kids called “couch jumps, roller-squeezer, and buffalo rides.” And the added benefit? Fathers who engage in physical play with their children have higher levels of oxytocin—the love hormone.15 Wins all around!

Getting clear on values can support friendliness and cooperation with our partners. Another big piece of an intimate relationship is sex. Almost every mom I’ve met has experienced some disparity between how much sex she wants and how much her partner wants after the baby arrives. Moms who felt overworked and grabbed at all day were worried that a nice hug from her partner would inevitably lead to the bedroom. And their partners were confused by the withdrawal of physical affection.

Alongside rebuilding a foundation of good communication, teamwork, and friendship, Mother Nurture explores practical, respectful ways to get both of your needs met—beyond just “accepting your differences.”

To boost physical intimacy, many women need non-sexual affection (like a no-strings attached hug), practical help with children, and fair division of household duties. Also, talking about your differences in sexual desire can open a pathway to solutions. Lead by expressing your softer emotions of sadness, fear, and hurt—this can help curb judgement and foster empathy for your partner.

Ultimately, sex is rooted in connection. Hanson suggests asking your partner to ask you “three questions a day about your inner world” to reawaken the energy of when you started dating. I found that when Mike took on more responsibilities in the home, I had more time to pursue work and other interests, which led to us having more to talk about (that didn’t involve the house and kids). We rekindled our admiration for each other which brought us closer—and invited more physical intimacy.
It was hard to see these struggles as a storm that would soon pass. Even now I sometimes feel shame when I think of how thin I was stretched when my kids were babies—I wonder if I gave them enough attention. I wasn’t really the mother I thought I’d be—one that had a learning activity every day, avoided all screen time, never yelled, and never hid in my closet just to breathe. But as I’ve learned to be kinder to myself, I’ve noticed that kindness shines outward toward my children, husband, and everyone else in my sphere.

My adjustments to get more sleep, have a nutrient-dense diet, ease my stress, fuel my spirit, and communicate more skillfully with my partner completely changed my life. But each of the changes affected the other, like the unfolding of an image in a kaleidoscope.

A few years have gone by since those days. As I write, I’m sitting quietly in a library near our home. My kids are off learning to read and finger paint. Mike has drastically cut down his work hours to help at home as I’m happily working part-time. I meditated this morning while Mike made lunches and got the kids to school. I’ve lowered my expectations of a clean house, what the kids should wear, how many meals need to be homemade, or even how I should look. That has made space for the joy I had desired all along. I do still shudder walking by dishes in the sink, but I’m working on letting that go too.

My world is messier and noisier now. The storm is over, the sun is out, and like a little groundhog, I’ve come out of my hole to take a look around. My eyes are open and I see a socioeconomic system that has failed mothers. I can’t fix it, not immediately anyway. What I can do is offer moms a flashlight to find their way through the darkness. Hopefully one day depleted mothers will become a thing of the past. Until then, there’s Mother Nurture.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Renee Brna is a writer and researcher at the Wellspring Institute for Neuroscience and Contemplative Wisdom. She was previously a professional actor and singer who performed on Broadway, in national tours, and on television. She earned her BA in Psychology from the University of Nevada, Las Vegas. She lives with her husband, two kids, and affectionate Border Collie in Ventura, California.
The dawn arises and so do I.

Amongst the flickering shadows of a new day,

I rest in solitude and unity.

At one with all who share this mystery called life.

Perils surround us in a world of not knowing and uncertainty.

And yet, and yet...

The heart of compassion emerges far and wide,

Pervading the very deepest of sorrows.

A kindness infused with hope,

Threading the human fabric with tender grace and resilience.

Marilyn Rothman has been practicing Buddhist meditation in the Theravada tradition for 40 years. She worked at the Insight Meditation Society (IMS) in Massachusetts for close to 10 years managing silent meditation retreats and has attended several retreats in Burma.
The suffering we feel is rooted in how tangled up we are. Many of us feel tangled by our fears, our resentments, and our stories about ourselves and others. We feel controlled by behaviors we can’t change, thoughts we can’t stop, feelings we don’t want to feel. We feel tangled in confusion, or in misperception, or in traumas we haven’t learned how to heal. Living so tangled up contorts our bodies, and we end up walking through life like “the ministry of silly walks” in the old Monty Python skit. This reduces our availability to life, to others, and to our true selves.

In the early texts of Buddhism, someone is said to have approached the Buddha (whose name was Siddhartha Gotama) and asked, “The inner tangle and the outer tangle, this generation is entangled in a tangle. And so I ask of Gotama this question: Who succeeds in disentangling this tangle?” It is up to you and me to untangle it.
The “tangle” is all the ways we bind ourselves up in our fears, our unhelpful stories, and our self-created clouds of confusion. It is made out of the ways we try to seek happiness and avoid suffering that totally don’t work. I’ve experienced it myself, and I see it often with the students who study with me. No matter the differences in where they’re from, how they look, or what they do, the students who come to me so often feel overwhelmed, stressed, anxious, and lonely. They suffer from a profound disconnect from others, like they’re floating in space, untethered. They often—sometimes very often—think that their actual experiences or even their entire lives are not as good as ones they’ve idealized. They are consumed by the fear that they are unlovable just as they are. The suspicion, often unnamed but still lurking under the surface of everything, is that they’ll never be enough to meet what life brings their way.

The experience of the COVID-19 pandemic heightened a lot of this suffering. Certainly in the United States, as loved ones became ill, many people died, employment became precarious, our daily behavior was strictly limited, and feelings of instability and fear of disaster came rushing to the fore. The virus exacerbated the anxiety that is threaded through a lot of economic, political, and social issues. Our vulnerability was exposed, and we were reminded that we are not in control. Suddenly, our fragility felt very real.

Life is fragile. It’s delicate and subject to ever-changing circumstances. The pandemic didn’t create that reality; it only made it clearer. We try to hide the tangles we’re caught in under fancy clothes. We pretend that the lopsided way we’re walking through life is a swagger. What happens when the costumes and coping mechanisms are pulled away? Among the many extraordinary things about the entire world going through the shared traumas of COVID-19 was that it made our shared suffering more visible.

The Loneliness Epidemic

A physician I know is consumed with the feeling that they are never meeting expectations. They didn’t reach everyone they wanted to reach that day. They didn’t do everything they
So many of us hold fast to an anxious belief that we must do some particular thing or be some particular way in order to be lovable. We can become so fixated on this seemingly urgent requirement that all we see is our own success and (inevitable) failure instead of the real people we are supposed to be loving and being loved by. Ultimately we are incapable of enjoying the simple giving and taking that our strategy was meant to bring us. This is one of many different tangles that can ensnare us in self-referential obsessions even as we wonder why we are so exhausted, so frustrated, and so lonely.

Loneliness is itself a different kind of public health epidemic. Hundreds of articles have been published about loneliness and its detrimental effects on our mental, emotional, and physical health. Britain has even appointed a loneliness minister. Their role is to address the erosion of families and communities, the tearing apart of the social fabric, rising divorce rates, and all forms of isolation. And yet, on a daily basis, how many people do you personally see or hear expressing that they’re unbearably lonely? One of the symptoms of the trouble is that the ones suffering from loneliness often do not share their struggle—sometimes they don’t know how to name it even for themselves.

Junk Pleasure

The consequences of the way we tangle ourselves up are very real. Even those of us who have succeeded in ways that society values—getting married, making money, acquiring status—often feel unanchored, disengaged, and empty, and they can’t figure out why. Frequently, we attempt to fill the hole we feel with junk pleasure, which our culture feeds us in steady supply: shopping, alcohol and drugs, sex and porn, food, you name it. It’s not that there’s anything wrong with these things in and of themselves (personally, I’ve got a weakness for Apple products). It’s that they aren’t able to do what we’re asking them to do. And when they fail or are not available, then we can get desperate.

During the COVID-19 pandemic we have been told many times that what we need to do is “shelter in place.” This has often sounded to me like a coded message from the universe, a Zen message, if you will, because amid our pain, sheltering in place is exactly what we need to do. We need to take shelter in being exactly in the place that we are now, because when we do that, where we are now becomes the place of practice.
Finding Shelter Is a Place of Practice

The following is a practice to help you begin to identify your tangles. It’s a good way to begin working with the practices in this book, and you can return to it any time.

Find somewhere to sit comfortably. Let your body settle in a way that feels good. Make whatever microadjustments are needed. Be aware of your breathing, and then let your awareness of your breath draw you into your lower belly. Allow your belly to be soft. Let your awareness arrive fully in the body, flowing throughout it until you can feel the sensations throughout your body. Feel clearly that your body is your place. This body of sensations right here, with its tension and pleasures, its tingling and its vibrations, this body of sensations is your home. Let the sensations rise freely into your awareness. Let yourself settle as one with them. Let them hold your awareness, anchoring it and giving your mind a place to shelter.

Entering a place of refuge is a place of practice.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Sensei Koshin Paley Ellison, MFA, LMSW, DMIN, is an author, Zen teacher, and Jungian psychotherapist. Koshin co-founded the New York Zen Center for Contemplative Care, a non-profit that offers contemplative approaches to care through education, care partnering, and Zen practice. Koshin is a renowned thought leader in contemplative medicine; his pioneering work has been featured in the New York Times, PBS, CBS Sunday Morning among other media outlets.
Author’s note: Trust in Awakening is a re-working of an ancient Zen poem, often translated as “Faith in Mind.” I wrote this book to give a modern presentation to “the path of no path” – the flowering of awakening. I wanted to sharpen the poem stanzas to better reflect specific realization and the lure, the pull of each of our personalities to keep us in an ordinary state of mind as a solo individual rather than resting in the undivided oneness of realization of the source – the Absolute.

The Xin Xin Ming is considered the first poem of Zen (Ch’an). It is far more than simply a poem. It is a direct pointing to the source—the Absolute—and the Absolute in each of us that we call “true nature.” It is considered a direct teaching in Zen. A direct teaching is presented with as little conceptual framing as possible. It is pointing to the source itself again and again in different voices. A direct teaching cuts through theorizing and lands us directly in the Absolute or in one of its functions—Absence (emptiness) or Presence being core functions.

During my nearly fifty years of Zen practice, I have turned to this poem as a source of inspiration, a map of sorts to the path of no path. This poem gives subtle pointers, then removes the concepts from those pointers, leaving the direct knowing of truth.

I wrote this book to be a companion to my books Buddha’s Heart (describing the ancient Buddhist heart practices) and Demystifying Awakening (revealing the process, impact, and path of Awakening). I want this book to be a nonconceptual vehicle of direct pointing to the source, the truth, the inherent nature of us all. While this book can be used at any stage of spiritual development or realization, it is most beneficial in the hands of one who feels the burn for Awakening, that all-consuming fire drawing one toward deeper and deeper absolute truth.
This book can be the catalyst for that explosion of Awakening we call kensho in Zen. Kensho is seeing your true nature—that is, seeing the Absolute, the source, fully manifesting as you. May this book spark your Awakening!

Here are a few stanzas from Trust in Awakening with my commentary for each stanza:

The Great Way is effortless
The Great Way is the path of spiritual development and the unfolding of Awakening. “Being effortless” means no doer or sense of self is taking action. When we bring effort to an activity, we bring our thoughts and conceptual understanding to it. But neither thought nor concepts abide in the Absolute. When we understand how to dismiss the sense of self from effort, our action becomes effortless and we begin walking the path. We are following the Great Way.

With no preferences
Preferences derive from our internal self-talk of “I like this” and “I do not like that.” Our preferences support our customary self-identity. Only when we drop preferences, drop like and dislike, can we see the Great Way before us.

Surrender desire and aversion
In Buddhism we discuss three defilements. Defilements are core inclinations that drive the sense of self, making it appear real to us. The three defilements, which everyone has, are desire, aversion, and delusion. Desire is a longing for things. We believe these things will make us feel safe and whole. Conversely, aversion is a dislike for things. We believe pushing bad things away from us will keep only good ones close. Finally, delusion is a misperception and misunderstanding of reality. We believe the customary self-identity is something real and solid.
By surrendering desire and aversion, we allow what is unfolding in our life to be here while viewing it as exactly right for this moment. We can be with the natural flow of reality.

Clarity dazzles

By releasing desire and aversion, even temporarily, we can witness the natural quality of inner spaciousness. When concepts are few, we can see the dazzling clarity, the crispness, the precision, and the inherent perfection of our deeper true nature.

— Do you see it, right here, right now?

Clutch likes and dislikes

When we hold tight to our likes and dislikes, we eliminate other possibilities. We fixate on the concept of only two options as answers to a particular issue: right or wrong. This position takes away all other possibilities for a different result.

Further, our customary self-identity is composed in part by the aggregation of our likes and dislikes. As we release and put down likes and dislikes, we become open to a variety of choices while untethering our sense of self from fixed opinions.

The principal mind disease

In Buddhist practice, we notice that by holding fast to our particular likes and dislikes, we are continually recreating a sense of self that feels substantial or real. This deep-seated belief, this conviction, of the authenticity of the self is the principal mental hurdle to returning home to nibbāna.

In Awakening, we perceive that any sense of self is really an absence of self. The core of our beingness is actually a form of emptiness, an infinite spaciousness, a lack of substantiability. This absence of self does not hold opinions or positions. When deeply in absence of self, awareness finds itself in each new moment, with each fresh breath.
Not consummating true nature

When we do not make contact regularly with our deeper true nature, we lose the perception that we intrinsically belong with all that manifests now, in this very moment. Touching into our true nature has the felt-sense qualities both of being objective and unconditioned: objective in not reaffirming any sense of self; unconditioned in always being present right here now, rather than created or born.

We can make contact with our deeper true nature through different meditations and spiritual practices. The ancient Buddhist heart meditations are a way to directly touch and rest in the qualities of our true nature. (These meditations are presented in my book Buddha’s Heart.)

Agitates the mind

When we are not in contact with our true nature, we are unsettled, discontented, or ill at ease. We are agitated, trying to get from here to there, somewhere other than right here. We are seeking certain specific experiences to get away from who we take ourselves to be. The mental process of believing “I am here and I want to get or go there” stirs the mind and agitates our inherent peacefulness.

Resting in and as our true nature pacifies the choppy waves of self and our ceaseless efforts to fortify and maintain the customary sense of self. Resting in and as our true nature lets us relax deeply in the truth of who we are.

— Where is your mind in this very moment?

Unbind thought and concept
Roam openly
Inhabit the source
Know all meaning
Unbind thought and concept

As we rely more upon inner intuitive knowing, seeing, hearing, tasting, and touching, we unbind thought and concept from defining and maintaining the placement of reality. We relax our allegiance to thought and concept; we withdraw from them. We may witness firsthand that the inner knowing of Absence holds objective truths that are unconditioned, that are not subject to birth or death. These are everlasting qualities of true nature, always fully available in our consciousness.

Roam openly

When we roam openly, we traverse the length and breadth of our inner spaciousness, of our consciousness, from this world to other universes, including the source of the Absolute. When we are not invested in maintaining a particular self, we are home everywhere. We can then rest in knowing the wholeness of perfection of manifested reality, what actually is here.

Inhabit the source

When we inhabit the source, we become a vessel, a conduit, through which the Absolute flows, witnessing itself as the source and manifestation of all reality. Rest in the truth that you are fully Absence and Presence.

Know all meaning

When Absence, true nature, and the Absolute are the sources we check in with to confirm our identity, we understand everything in proper relationship. There is nothing added or subtracted in reality. When we abide continuously in pure love and Presence, see the world in all its divergent parts as being expressions of seamless love coupled with Presence, we know all meaning.

— Everything is right here, right now. Do you see it?
Awakening dawns

When our consciousness wakes to the present reality of our true nature, we know “this is me/I am this” always and without qualification, and Awakening recognizes itself. True nature as our core abides without insisting, waiting to be experientially witnessed. When we witness it or rather when true nature witnesses itself, Awakening dawns.

Eclipse form and Absence

In sustained deeper Awakening experiences, we drop everything because we are resting in the embodied knowing, the unrestricted perception of the infinite Oneness of all reality. We drop all concepts and all realities built upon the foundation of fabricated, conditioned thought. Even the conceptual positions of form and Absence are eclipsed. In reality, there is no form or Absence. When we dwell in no form and absence of form, then we truly know form and Absence by direct contact rather than through conceptual frameworks, affording us direct knowing.

No beginning, no end

When we hold the concepts of a beginning and an end, we commit to the passage of time from past to present to future. But all time is an unconditioned present moment. The unending present moment. It is free from birth and death. It has always existed and always will exist. No beginning or end means right here, right now, nothing added or deducted. When we are one with Cessation—with Absence and simultaneously Presence—we see there is nowhere to go and no one to go there. We have already arrived.
Sever every opinion

We must voluntarily release any and every opinion about the world, even the world of Awakening. We must sever ourselves from opinions about Cessation, the unmanifest, the manifest, pure love, pure Presence, pure awareness, and the lack of these. All are points of view. Reality always is, right here and right now.

— Where are you looking?

Abiding in Absence

Absence is a core quality of Cessation and the unmanifest functioning of the Absolute. It is a core quality of each being in creation. When we are not deluded by appearances, we rest in and as Absence, in and as the boundless potential of vast spaciousness.

Conceit humbles

One of the last opinions to fall away is conceit. (I’m referring to conceit not in terms of worldly abilities but rather in the experience of realization itself.) A mind harboring conceit because of realization is not a mind resting in and functioning from realization itself. This clinging to experience reveals that despite deep realization, investigation of personal conceptual convictions and beliefs remains. This is the ceaselessness of the spiritual path.

There is no end to realizations and no end to unconscious personal material needing to be engaged, excised, and liberated.

Realization does not make us special. It makes us profoundly ordinary. We become a conduit for our true nature, for truth to spontaneously, joyfully, authentically express itself as it wishes and as needed. We are the servants of truth, which is the Absolute in its manifest and unmanifest functions.

Residing in wisdom

"Wisdom" means to see clearly and take action that is appropriate, attuned precisely to what is needed in each new moment. Wisdom is not discerned by concept or thought. There is no self to get anything, to go anywhere, or to be anyone in particular. Then we can be unique, special, and express true nature’s wisdom with a natural, authentic humility.

Quiet confidence

When concepts and thoughts are stilled, profound quiet serenity pervades our consciousness. Seeing there is no me or you, no here or there, no time other than the endless now, our confidence is expressed as a lack of hesitation, of questioning, and of doubt. Truth knows itself. From intimately knowing itself, truth can be perfectly attuned in each moment.

— Where is your seat in this moment?

Awake

Awakening experiences open our consciousness to the multilayered reality of life. We can be aware simultaneously of a physical level, Absence and Presence qualities, and psychological structures. In other words, the personality can be perceived while also directly experiencing the depth of Absence and the functioning of Presence and love. This is awakeness.
Who is holy or wise

Should we wish to be seen by others as holy or wise, it usually indicates we are neither. It is the subtlety of conceit of the spiritual experience that is operating. After the sense of self, the me, is thoroughly seen through to its core conviction of deficiency and that deficiency is resolved, the self-identity drops and does not return. The simple functioning of love replaces the clinging and grasping motivations of the customary self-identity. How can the core of Absence have any desire, even any wish, to be seen as holy or wise? When we truly know through direct experience what we genuinely are, we know simultaneously what everyone is. Everything is unfolding in a unified field of love and Presence.

Uninhibited trust

When we see the Absolute abiding as the source and core of all reality, we perceive and know the universe is intrinsically benevolent and well-intentioned toward all. We have a thorough, uninhibited trust that all will be well and love will always heal hatred.

Heartful modesty

As the Absolute functions as a particular person or other being, it is functioning as love and Presence. Love is at the cellular core of all intention and action. The Absolute is contacting Absence and Presence in every single interchange, moment by moment. We have no urge to control or direct any aspect of reality because of our arising trust in the love quality of the Absolute. We also recognize that we never have all the information to fully understand the subtlety of the Absolute's functioning. Both this core love and acknowledgement of the Absolute's subtlety opens a natural, authentic humility in us, a heartful modesty.

— Do you claim your spiritual experiences?
Heavenly contentment

When we know with every fiber of our being that love and Presence are the function of the Absolute appearing in the everyday world, reality opens our awareness to the peace that surpasses understanding. This peace is the contentment, the uncontracted satisfaction, of the heavens operating as our everyday world. What more can we ever need?

Everything necessary is always right here, resting here, offering itself with breathtaking generosity and thorough abundance without insistence.

Without past or future

With no self-identity functioning, we give no weight to the concepts of past or future. There is just this particular moment, always. Landing here affords us a freedom from regret of the past and from compulsive planning to ensure a particular future. This does not mean we can avoid the work of healing from past trauma and of reconciling our past with its landmines of guilt and shame. It does mean we do what is obvious and wholehearted in this moment, seeking always to be true to the purity and clarity of the Absolute.

Without here or there

All time and all locations are always present, right here and right now. When the concepts of time and distance drop, there is only an eternal now and an eternal here. When awareness is everywhere, how do we divide everywhere into a here or a there?
Trust in Awakening

Awakening challenges our firm conviction in our sense of self and our being in a particular point in time as delusion. Our commitment to the customary self-identity omits the truth of the Absolute: love and Presence are the creative, generative forces of all reality. Only through the process of Awakening can we know that the self, as we hold it, is all Absence and Presence of the Absolute. And Absence and Presence are both propelled by pure love. As Awakening then deepens through penetration of increasingly subtle levels of reality, the roots and defenses of our customary self-identity weaken and fall away. All our action and all we witness is realized as an expression, a function, of love. This pure love generates wholesome trust in the benevolence of the Absolute. We then know and trust that love is always returning to itself as each and every form, always in this very moment, right here. Experiencing further levels of reality, we experience deeper and deeper trust in the reality of Awakening.

— Do you trust in Awakening?

These stanzas are offered to highlight the relationship of ordinary mind and the Absolute. These point to the conceptual holdings that bind us to the world of suffering, delusion, and identity. As we relinquish control with its function of doing while shifting to deeper acceptance of universal truth, we begin to live a life of Being. Then the path of no-path unfolds revealing the splendor and mystery of the Absolute.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Stephen Doetsu Snyder is a Zen and Theravada Buddhist teacher. He has maintained a daily and retreat practice for nearly fifty years. He combines the beauty and power of the ancient heart practices called the “divine abodes,” the bharma viharas, with deep awakening practices to support students in opening the fulness of their hearts while deepening contact and realization of the source of all manifestation and creation – the Absolute.

You can find information on his teaching, interviews, and books on his website – AwakeningDharma.org.
Your Skillful Means, sponsored by the Wellspring Institute, is designed to be a comprehensive resource for people interested in personal growth, overcoming inner obstacles, being helpful to others, and expanding consciousness. It includes instructions in everything from common psychological tools for dealing with negative self talk, to physical exercises for opening the body and clearing the mind, to meditation techniques for clarifying inner experience and connecting to deeper aspects of awareness, and much more.

Grounding

PURPOSE/EFFECTS

Modern life is so complex and busy that it is common for people to feel overly mental, caught up in too much thinking, “revved up,” worried, spacey, or even “disembodied.” Under such conditions, the world begins to seem flat, two dimensional, lifeless, adversarial, and painful.

Luckily there is a quick cure for this feeling, which is to get “grounded.” Grounding means to bring awareness back into the body, back into the senses, and back into the present. These three things -- the body, the senses, and the present -- are the keys to reigniting creativity, passion, love, connection, peace, and wellbeing.

Grounding is also very easy to do.

METHOD

Summary

Sit still and connect with your body and your senses.

Long Version

1. Find a comfortable sitting posture. Your back should be straight and your body relaxed.
2. Close your eyes, and take ten slow, deep, full breaths. With each exhale, imagine that you are breathing out all your worries and cares.
3. Continuing to breathe deeply, concentrate on feeling your feet. Simply see if you can feel the

---

Perspectives on Self-Care

Be careful with all self-help methods (including those presented in this Bulletin), which are no substitute for working with a licensed healthcare practitioner. People vary, and what works for someone else may not be a good fit for you. When you try something, start slowly and carefully, and stop immediately if it feels bad or makes things worse.
4. Now see if you can feel the sensations in your hands. Can you feel your palms tingling? Do this before moving on to the next step.

5. Keep breathing deeply. Continue to feel the sensations in your hands and feet. Do this for ten slow breaths.

6. Now see if you can feel the sensations in your whole body. Let your awareness cover your entire body at once. Feel yourself breathing. Feel your butt on the floor (or chair). Do this for ten more breaths.

7. Continue this for as long as you like, or at least 5 minutes.

HISTORY

This grounding exercise is a combination of many similar exercises. It is a quick, basic mindfulness practice that will get you in touch with your sensory experience of the present moment.

SEE ALSO

What Is Meditation?
Meditation Posture

Fare Well
May you and all beings be happy, loving, and wise.

The Wellspring Institute
For Neuroscience and Contemplative Wisdom

The Institute is a 501c3 non-profit corporation, and it publishes the Wise Brain Bulletin. The Wellspring Institute gathers, organizes, and freely offers information and methods – supported by brain science and the contemplative disciplines – for greater happiness, love, effectiveness, and wisdom. For more information about the Institute, please go to wisebrain.org/wellspring-institute.

If you enjoy receiving the Wise Brain Bulletin, please consider making a tax-deductible donation to the Wellspring Institute. Simply visit WiseBrain.org and click on the Donate button. We thank you.